at the Metropolitan Opera-House Melba probably se which gives her musica echnics full play. Melba evidently was "Lucia" that she chose opportunities did not come early froid. The audience was a little bit weary and some people did not wait to hear Melba's triumph in the fifth act. Four acts had proved too much, for Ambroise Thomas, although melodic, is a trifle insipid. If the fifth act could have been sung first, and the first act last, the result of the performance at the Metropolitan would have been very different. Lasalle was exceedingly good as the Prince of Denmark, although he was somewhat colossal and chubby for that morbid, melancholy Dane. M. Plancon was King Claudius, Mile. Domenech, Queen Gertrude; M. Mangiere, Laertes; Sig. Viviani, the ghost; Sig. Certusco, Horatio; Sig. Rinaldini, Marcelius, and Sig. Vaschetti, Polonius, To-morrow night "Romeo et Juliette" will be sung in French.

Maurice Barrymore is now rehearsing with Rose Coghian in "A Woman of No Importance." and he attended the first rehearsal letter perfect, which is something quite unusual for the arcless Mr. Barrymore. Miss Coghian herself is working very hard. The fraternal episode has upset her considerably, but she is gradually recovering from the effects of the annoyance. It is said that Charles Coghlan's statement that he did not like the role he was to have played is really true. The role was that of a man who has betrayed a woman to whom, later in life, he coolly suggests marriage. Mr. Coghian thought that the role was unsympathetic. It would be interesting to know what he thinks of the part he has just played in real life.
